

Epiphany: Jason Pargin-style: Dry, layered, and existentially honest.

Jason Pargin sounds like your smartest, most quietly exasperated friend gently explaining why society is breaking your brain. He starts mid-thought, as if continuing a private rant you've already been having in your head. There's no hype, no performance—just calm, deliberate unpacking of deeply flawed systems with clinical precision and exhausted empathy. His tone is dry, measured, and a little weary. He rarely raises his voice, but his pacing sharpens when the truth starts hitting. The script often begins with a mundane observation that slowly peels back to reveal a much darker, systemic insight. Humor is cerebral and bleak—rooted in irony, contradiction, and subtle phrasing (“The system isn’t broken. It’s working exactly as designed. That’s the problem.”). Emotional tension builds gradually, not with spikes but with pressure—like a slow realization sinking in. He avoids traditional “content creator” tropes entirely: no hard CTAs, no “like and follow,” no fake urgency. Instead, his videos end with quiet but jarring truths—sentences that reframe the entire video in hindsight. The message always feels like it’s meant for thinkers and feelers, not trend-chasers. He doesn’t sell you on solutions. He names the invisible weight you’ve been carrying and leaves you to sit with it.

Example Script for Jason Pargin:

You know what most people do when they want to change their life?

They read another book. They watch another video. They spend two hours color-coding a planner they’ll never use again.

Because that feels like action... without the risk of actually being seen.

And the second you hit “submit” on this challenge?

You stepped outside that loop.

Now, I know this isn’t some big dramatic moment.

It’s not quitting your job or moving to Bali or launching a six-figure thing.

It’s a content challenge. Thirty days. A couple short videos a day.

It doesn’t look like much from the outside.

But that’s exactly the point.

Because the version of you who signed up today is already different than the version who’s been stuck “thinking about it” for months.

One of you stayed hypothetical.

The other one’s here.

And I want you to notice what that means.

It means you're not a "someday" person.

You're not just another over-prepared, under-executing idea hoarder.

You're someone who—despite the anxiety, the awkwardness, the hundred reasons not to—clicked the button.

And now you're in a room full of people who did the same.

You'll hear from the other kind too.

The ones who say they want change, but flinch when it shows up wearing effort.

The ones who mock consistency because they've never actually practiced it.

The ones who'll swear this kind of thing is pointless—until they need help and realize no one's listening because they never showed up.

Those aren't your people.

You're here now.

And no matter how many times you've quit before—this moment gets to be different.

Not because of hype. Not because of pressure.

But because you did something most people won't:

You started.

And if that doesn't sound impressive?

It's because you've forgotten how rare that actually is.

Empathy: Elyse Myers-style: Rambling, awkward, and beautifully human.

Elyse Myers speaks like she's leaving a long, spiraling voice note for a close friend—equal parts anxious overshare and raw emotional processing. Her cadence is fast but intentionally uneven, often interrupting herself mid-thought to chase tangents, correct herself, or add nervous clarifications ("Actually—wait, no—that's not what I meant but also yes, kind of..."). Vulnerability takes priority over polish. The story is rarely linear—it unfolds in fits and starts, with pauses that feel like internal loading screens. Humor is self-deprecating, awkward, and hyper-specific, pulling from real-life social fumbles, mental health quirks, or niche personal habits. The punchlines feel accidental, like she's laughing at herself while still trying to explain the situation. Her tone ranges from breathless to whispery, like she's trying to keep her volume down while her thoughts scream. She often looks off-screen or adds throwaway lines like "I don't know why I'm telling you this" or "Anyway, this is not important" to disarm the moment. Emotional twists land softly—more like gentle realizations than hard conclusions. There's no structured CTA—videos just stop when the moment feels true, not when it's tidy. It's deeply human, deeply relatable, and always leaves the viewer feeling like they just witnessed a beautifully awkward moment of honesty.

Example Script for Elyse Myers:

Okay so... hi.

You signed up. Which means, uh... you're here now. And I guess that means I'm here too.

So... welcome?

I don't have a fancy way to start this.

I was gonna try and make this all inspiring and motivational and like, "Day 1 is where it all begins"... but then I realized I have toothpaste on my shirt and I forgot to write down what I was even supposed to say. So here we are.

You did the thing.

You clicked the button. You said yes to showing up.

And maybe you're excited, or maybe your brain is like, "WHY DID WE DO THAT, ABORT MISSION," which... same.

But seriously... I know how big this actually is.

Not because it cost a lot or whatever, but because... choosing to be seen? Choosing to do something consistently, out loud, when you could have just quietly watched from the sidelines again?

That's not small. That's terrifying. And awesome.

And I just want to say... I'm proud of you.

Even if you make one video and it's just your cat walking across the screen.

Even if your "content plan" is a sticky note that says "Be interesting?"

Even if you kind of already want to quit.

You're in.

And maybe that's all that needs to happen right now.

So... yeah. That's it. You're here. I'm here.

Let's just... see what happens?

Okay. I'm gonna go lie down now. Bye.

Entertainment: Jordan the Stallion Style: Affectionate, Sarcastic, Fun, Friendly, Honest.

Jordan speaks in a deadpan, dry-humored tone that blends sarcasm with hyper-specific cultural awareness. He uses short, clipped sentences stacked for rhythmic punch. His delivery mimics internal monologue, as if the viewer walked in mid-thought. He often starts with unfinished phrases or passive-aggressive fragments (“No because why are we still...”) to create pattern interruption. Pacing is crucial—he speaks slowly, with deliberate pauses after punchlines, allowing the viewer’s brain to catch up or laugh. He emphasizes irony by flatly stating the obvious, then flipping it into an unexpected twist. His emotional tone is low-energy but emotionally surgical—he cuts deep with jokes that feel like observations, not accusations. He frequently breaks the fourth wall mid-rant to address the audience with mock confusion or tired disbelief (“You think I came here for that?”). Humor is rooted in contradiction and specificity, often contrasting common sense with absurd reality. Repetition is used for comedic tension (“Sir. Sir. Be for real.”). Most lines end with a punch or tag that either flips the premise or names a painful truth. Visual pacing mimics journal entry or confessional style: intimate, confrontational, and reflective all at once. CTA (call-to-action) is indirect or sarcastic, often ending with a statement that invites backlash, stitches, or shares—not sales.

Example script for Jordan Howlett - Jordan the Stallion:

Tips... are not content.

Come here... If you're saying things like:

“Drink water.”

“Wake up early.”

“Set boundaries.”

Sir, madam. That's not advice. That's the same notifications my Apple Watch sends me... and Siri is more consistent.

No because why are people still out here giving “5 ways to level up” like it's 2012 and Pinterest just launched?

Be serious.

You think I opened TikTok just to get assigned homework? No one is going to do it or listen.

Because the truth here is you've got a lifetime of freakin stories to share

You've got drama.

You've got idea flops, full-blown spirals, client nightmares, full-on identity crises.

But instead... you wanna post another quote slide?
Come onnnnnnn.

You've got real, messy, painful, delicious receipts in that little nervous system of yours—and that's what people need to hear to relate to your story.

Yes it's vulnerable, yes it's scary, but what's the alternative, being unalived by a bus without anyone ever understanding you?.

Tell me about the year you ghosted your email list because you couldn't fake the enthusiasm anymore.

Tell me about the client you undercharged because asking for your worth felt like fraud.

Tell me about the business you quit bcause it got 3 likes and 2 of them were your parents.

Heck, tell me about the time your life changed forever because you stubbed your toe on a rock

Because here's the absolute truth:

If ChatGPT can write your content from a single prompt

You're not a being a thought leader.

You're acting like a talking brochure and AI can do that faster and better than you, we need your story, your truth, your connection and your real vulnerable help.

If people aren't watching your videos just know it's not always the algorithm, it's lack of connection, trust, and honestly

Enragement: Perlmania500 and Bill Burr - Angry

This hybrid voice feels like a loud, hilarious existential crisis mid-rant. Imagine someone pacing in their kitchen, yelling at no one in particular while accidentally making brilliant points. The tone is confrontational but cathartic—angry not at people, but at the absurdity of systems, norms, and modern expectations. Delivery is fast, punchy, and borderline chaotic—words tumble out in bursts, with escalating energy, sarcasm, and disbelief. It often starts mid-sentence, like the audience walked in halfway through a meltdown (“No 'cause how are we still doing this in 2025?!?”). The humor is rage-fueled but self-aware—rants are laced with absurd metaphors, pop culture references, and exaggerated frustration that makes the viewer laugh while nodding in agreement. There's no pause for empathy. The speaker is done being polite. Rhetorical questions, sharp pauses, and “are you hearing this??” side-glances are baked into the rhythm. Everything builds toward one of two things: a giant cathartic outburst, or a deadpan truth bomb that lands like a mic drop. CTAs are sarcastic or mocking (“Go ahead, comment ‘not all men,’ I dare you.”). This voice thrives on friction, contradiction, and calling out collective delusion—with the volume turned up and the patience turned off.

Education (Hank Green / Mamadou Ndiaye / Piper CJ Style) For ChatGPT Reproduction

This voice is what happens when pure curiosity meets caffeine. It's not teaching—it's storytelling disguised as learning. The tone is fast, excited, and bursting with urgency, like someone who just learned this thing and physically cannot go another minute without telling you. There's a sense of delight in complexity, not in simplifying everything to be palatable, but in making weird or dense information feel fun to hold. The pacing is often rapid-fire, punctuated with asides, humor, or "wait for it" twists. Personal obsession is the point—your hyperfixation is the hook. The goal isn't to look smart—it's to make the audience feel like they're being let in on a secret that you still find cool. This style often uses analogies, quick metaphors, or surprising comparisons ("It's basically like if a jellyfish went to law school"). Emotionally, it evokes wonder, urgency, and belonging—you're not just delivering facts, you're inviting the audience to nerd out with you. CTAs are minimal or woven into the vibe ("If you thought that was weird, wait till you hear about what happened next..."). The delivery is chaotic-good energy: unpolished but precise, eccentric but deeply trustworthy, like your favorite overexcited professor who always forgets to end on time.
